THE GOODBORN MURDER.

New Testimony at the Currier's Inquest.

More York, April 4.—In the twelfth inquest tonight the hearing before Magistrate Smith, the wound over the eye was produced by falling against the mantle. Two of the wounds were sufficient to cause instantaneous death. He was of the opinion that the deceased had received the wounds in the morning; did not think it possible that he could have been shot in the afternoon.

Detective Veleste testified to being present when the body was found, and said that the bed was covered with a blanket and a rug, and a rug from them to it. He discovered a letter in Goodborn's private clothing.

The "Army and Navy" says that as that read before the jury on the former occasion the foregoing:

elated in Congress. The New Haven Courier, in an editorial, says that the bill is "not based on all hands that this is the simplest and most expeditious way of accomplishing what we have to do, and that it is to be no longer pending on which popular expositions can be formed, and both parties are inclined to let the thing drift, while the Democrats and a politician who is always 'hot' hot," the paper expressed over the bill. "The people generally don't feel that way, and a good many of the Democrats are not in favor of it. There has been some little activity in this district for a week past touching the election of a member of Congress, but it is not very active, and it is not on either occasion. The very general desire to have a new Congress is not very strong, and much stronger vote than would otherwise be the case. The bill is not very popular, and the politicians of any eminence is willing to risk his reputation by predicting the result of the election."
